Active learning ideas for government document instruction

NGIN Documents Potluck May 19, 2014

Definition

“With an active learning approach, teachers design instruction that invites students to take action and to reflect on the skills and/ or the knowledge required to complete a task.”

Timothy G. Thomæs, ‘Active Learning’ in Encyclopedia of the Social and Cultural Foundations of Education. Sage Publications, Inc. , 2009.

2 active learning ideas

- Class participation in constructing a government organization chart
- Paired interview and search

Class contributions toward an organization chart

- Establish 3 branches of government
- What are the major components of each branch?
- What types of government publications are produced?

Paired interview and search exercise

- Demo catalog search for executive and legislative documents on sample topics
- Demo usa.gov search on same topics; link to agency web pages for further searching
- Pairs of students share topics, search for partner's documents and then their own

Fluidsurvey exercise

- Briefly interview the person next to you. Find out her/his topic, background information on the topic, and synonyms or keywords that would be helpful in the search for information. Input:* a. Topic; b. Other information (keywords, dates, history, etc.)
- Using Search It, locate 2 government documents that would provide information on that topic. Input:* a. Executive Branch document: Title, issuing agency, date; b. Legislative Branch document: Title, Congressional Issuing Body, date
- Use usa.gov or an agency home page to find a government document for your own topic (must be different than the 2 selected for you by your partner) Input:* a. Which government agency or office published the document? b. Briefly describe why this document might be a good resource for your research project.

SUMMARY □ The Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration (FMCSA) announces the availability of a new final report, “Evaluating the Potential Safety Benefits of Electronic Hours-of-Service Recorders.” The study quantitatively evaluated whether trucks equipped with Electronic Hours-of-Service Recorders (EHSRs) have a lower (or higher) crash and hours-of-service (HOS) violation rate than those without EHSRs. The safety benefits of EHSRs were quantitatively evaluated by comparing the crash risk for two exposure groups (i.e., EHSRs were considered to improve safety if the trucks with EHSRs showed a lower crash risk than trucks without EHSRs). For this project, EHSRs were defined as any device that electronically records drivers’ HOS. The study is an effort to further quantify the safety benefits of electronic logging devices (ELDs) and provides results that are consistent with the Agency’s estimates of safety

4.3 FUTURE RESEARCH

Although the current study involved the collection of comprehensive truck, carrier, crash, and HOS violation information, the carrier-collected data still rely on retrospective crash reconstruction. This information can be erroneous for a variety of reasons, such as eyewitness recall, limited pre-crash information, and unwillingness to report information for fear of prosecution, termination, or reprimand. A video-based naturalistic truck study would address these concerns. Many trucks would need to be involved to obtain the necessary number of crashes to assess the efficacy of EHSRs. The current study design could be expanded to include a larger, more representative sample. Although there were 224,034 truck-years, 82,943 crashes, and 970 HOS violations in the data set, the number of fatigue-related crashes represented a small portion of these (0.44 percent and 15.3 percent, respectively). Furthermore, analyses could be re-run using HOS violations over a longer period of time (as only the previous 2 years' worth of HOS violations were collected for the current study) using FMCSA's archived data. Future studies could also gather driver-based assessment of EHSRs through surveys or focus groups. Finally, the majority of participating carriers in the current study were large, for-hire carriers. An additional study with small-to-medium carriers (i.e., carriers with less than 250 power units) should be performed.

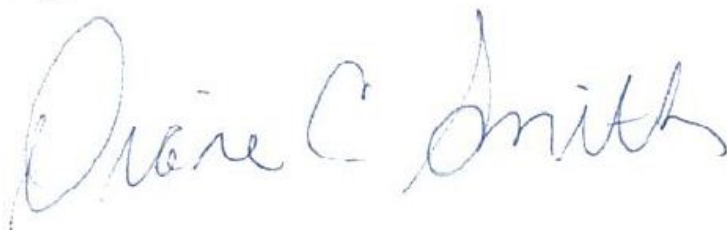

Electronic Logging Devices and Hours of Service Supporting Documents
Docket: FMCSA-2010-0167

My name is Diane Smith, I have been driving 9 years with a commercial license. I have always had a class A license since my beginning my career. I have operated all combo vehicles including passenger buses. I have operated tanker and van and have a valid hazmat endorsement.

I have experience preparing paper logs and have used an electronic log system for roughly 6 months. Other than my last 6 months, I have been specifically paper logging. The issues surrounding paper logs involved frequent pushback from previous employers encouraging me to run over hours. Employers have suggested to avoid tolls and weigh stations if I couldn't match it too my logs while encouraging I continue to make the delivery. I would also have loads dispatched on me that they knew there was no legal way to complete. The same company would encourage speeding and other means of log falsification. I had a lot of problems not knowing what town to flag when I took breaks or made stops. I no longer have to worry with electronic logs on locations.

Also, with electronic logs I feel better prepared for the day. I know exactly how many hours I have available and used for the week. I am in favor of the proposed ruling because I don't want to see fatigued driving play a factor in my safety. I like the communication features on my electronic logging device. It helps with my routing and day to day planning. It betters the communication between myself and my dispatch

Sincerely,

A handwritten signature in blue ink that reads "Diane C. Smith". The signature is written in a cursive, flowing style.
